1. The Architecture of Attention

In a post-industrial society, information becomes abundant while human attention becomes the true limiting factor of personal agency.

A wealth of information creates a poverty of attention. Deep reading requires deliberate boundaries between focused thought and continuous notification.

2. Media and Cognitive Focus

Every medium constructs an invisible architecture that channels where our eyes and thoughts settle.

The reader should be able to move to the next page, preserve the position, and add a local note.

3. Private Knowledge

Private knowledge grows when sources, notes, questions, and relationships remain traceable to their evidence.

The final page verifies page navigation and progress restoration.
